Digital Publishing: Outlook and Priorities for 2023
This is the second year that the AOP has surveyed the digital publishing industry – inviting publishers and solutions providers to share their organisational priorities and expectations for the future.

Responses to the survey were gathered from both members and non-members of the AOP, providing a broad snapshot of the important areas of focus for B2B and consumer publishers in the UK.

Following a year when the term “permacrisis” was recognised as the word of 2022, it’s reassuring that on a scale of 0 to 10, where 0 is very unconfident and 10 is very confident, across both publishers and solutions providers the confidence rating in the face of negative forecasts for the UK economy is 7.2. Publishers feel that they are well-positioned to adapt and thrive in a recessive economy. They are less sure of how to respond to the Online Safety Bill with a strong sense that the government’s current plans do not impact publishing businesses producing quality content, particularly those targeting B2B audiences.

The survey responses suggest progress in terms of preparing for the deprecation of the third-party cookie with publishers focused on their first-party data. Survey responses show that whilst 23% are focused on improving the engagement funnel, there is also a range of strategies being pursued by publishers to leverage the value of first-party data and their knowledge of their audiences – including shifting to engagement and attention metrics, and seller-defined audiences. 79% of our publisher respondents claim to be fully aligned as an organisation to ensuring that their audience data drives strategy across their business, or to be investing in tools to enable them to do this.

Growing revenues is a clear priority, but not to the detriment of a clear strategic focus on the people that drive the success of digital publishing. Where 0 = not a focus at all and 5 = a very strong focus, ensuring a diverse and inclusive workforce was the highest strategic priority with a 3.8 rating across all publishers.

Consumer publishers see subscriptions as offering the greatest potential for revenue growth, whilst B2B publishers [with an established heritage of subscription revenues] see lead generation, sponsorship and events as offering the greatest opportunities. There is a consistent indication that building stronger direct relationships with advertisers and agencies is the key to revenue growth – with 42% of all publishers predicting a growth in the importance of non-programmatic revenues over the next 3 years. 44% of all publishers also predict a growth in the importance of private marketplaces.

80% of publishers either have a strategy in place to meet ESG [Environmental Social Governance] goals or are putting in place plans to do so over the next few months. The motivation for this focus is placed equally on believing that it is central to their organisational values and important for their employees – with 67% of respondents citing both of these reasons. In terms of what publishing companies are doing to meet ESG goals, 75% state that they are focused on reducing the carbon footprint of their organisation as a whole.
Understanding publisher confidence

At a time when news coverage is focused on the cost-of-living crisis and the Bank of England is providing negative forecasts for the UK economy, publishers and solutions providers expressed a strong degree of confidence for their own businesses. Asked how confident they are that their company is well-positioned to manage the challenge and/or adapt and thrive in a recessive economy, where 0 is very unconfident and 10 is very confident, the average confidence rating for both publishers and solutions providers is 7.2.

Focusing on other external pressures and legislative challenges, we first asked publishers how confident they are that they understand the impact that the Online Safety Bill will have on their organisation. The confidence rating of publishers, based on the same scale from 0 to 10, is 5.6. This is higher than the 4.5 score provided last year when the same question was asked, but still suggests that publishers are unsure of the impact of this flagship piece of government legislation. Solutions providers agreed, providing a confidence score of 5.3 in their understanding of the impact this will have on their publishing clients. We asked publishers and their solutions providers to list the steps their organisation is taking to ensure compliance with the Online Safety Bill. The majority of responses suggested many are not taking specific steps – either replying “none”, “don’t know”, or “not applicable”. There was a strong sense that as publishers of quality content not targeting children, or of content specifically targeting a business audience, the Bill would not have an impact on their business. Where steps are being taken, these included consulting with legal teams, having a strong editorial policy, and relying on browser options.
We also asked how confident publishers were that they are prepared for Google’s deprecation of third-party cookies. Where 0 is unconfident and 10 is very confident, publishers’ confidence rating is at 6.5, which is exactly the same as when asked this question in last year’s survey. Solutions providers were less confident that publishers are prepared, suggesting a confidence rating of 4.8.

We asked publishers what actions they are taking to prepare for the deprecation of cookies and the forecast growth in the value of first-party data. 23% of publishers said that they were focused on improving the engagement funnel to build better first-party data – the most frequently cited area of focus. Only 4% of publishers said that they were collaborating on data sharing projects with other publishers, compared to 20% of publishers when asked the same question last year.

We wanted to understand how digital publishing companies are leveraging this increased focus on first-party data. 21% of publishers say that their teams are aligned internally and that audience insights are being communicated throughout the organisation. This compares to 17% of publishers saying this in last year’s survey. However, the same number, 21% of publishers, say that whilst they believe that being joined-up internally around audience data is important, they don’t yet have a strategy in place. This compares to 4% of publishers describing their position in this way last year.

None of our solutions provider respondents expressed belief that their publishing clients were fully aligned internally to leverage their available data.

Our publisher respondents demonstrated that they are strongly focused on their employees. Asked to rate how important different organisational priorities are [where 0 is not a focus at all and 5 is a very strong focus], B2B publishers ranked recruiting and retaining new talent as the most important priority, with a score of 4.1. Consumer publishers ranked ensuring a diverse and inclusive workplace as the most important priority, at 3.9. Publishers with brands targeting both business and consumer audiences ranked developing new revenue streams through product innovation as the highest priority at 3.9. Perhaps unsurprisingly solutions provider respondents suggested that reviewing tech stacks to make sure they support business objectives should be an important priority for publishers with a ranking of 4, with developing new first party identity strategies and data privacy compliance and transparency a close second at 3.8.

Other priorities mentioned by publishers included: retaining existing talent, improving sales ROI, improving client and vendor engagement, and using existing features and functionality to create new streams of revenue for sites that don’t currently use this functionality.

Other priorities mentioned by solutions providers included: compliance, managing legislative changes, automation of workflows and UX [including page hygiene, page speed and viewability, and site stickiness].
Growing revenues

With growing revenues a clear priority for all publishers, where do they see the most potential for growth? Averaged across all publishers, subscriptions are seen as offering the most potential, with 17% of all publishers selecting this option. However, the responses show that B2B publishers now see the most opportunity for growth in lead generation, sponsorship, and events. Publishers with B2B and consumer targeted brands in their portfolio see eCommerce as offering the most potential. This might suggest that B2B publishing brands have a heritage of established subscriptions revenues and so are now looking to new areas for growth. Other sources of revenue growth mentioned include: marketing services, data analytics, content marketing, membership beyond subs, white labelling content, video, and mergers.

Focusing on advertising revenues, we wanted to understand where publishers are trading and if they forecast changes in the way that they will trade. Currently, publishers targeting consumer audiences are more reliant on the open marketplace whilst B2B and publishers with brands targeting both B2B and Consumer audiences have a more balanced reliance on open and private marketplaces and non-programmatic trading. More noticeable is the shift that all publishers expect to see in the next three years – 44% of all publishers expect to see growth in revenues from private marketplaces and 42% expect to see growth in non-programmatic revenues.

Revenue growth is dependent on audience growth and so we wanted to understand where publishers were investing off-platform to drive content discovery. Unsurprisingly, B2B publishers are dependent on LinkedIn, with 44% investing here to promote content. Consumer publishers are investing across multiple off-platforms to drive content discovery.

Responsible publishing

We wanted to understand how the digital publishing sector is changing the way that it does business to respond to global challenges. 80% of respondents to this survey stated that they either have a published plan of intent and are taking action to work towards meeting ESG [Environmental, Social, Governance] targets or are planning to put actions in place in the next few months.

Which of the following statements best sums up how your business is taking action to address global challenges?

- We have a published plan of intent and are taking action to work towards meeting ESG targets: 35%
- We are considering how we respond to calls for businesses to take action to achieve ESG targets and expect to put them in place in the next few months: 45%
- Formulating an organisational plan of action to achieve ESG targets is not high on our list of priorities: 20%

Our respondents state that their motivation for placing a strong importance on ESG goals is equally based on their values as an organisation, and the expectations of their employees. 58% agree that advertisers and agencies expect them to be developing and implementing a policy to meet ESG goals. The digital publishing sector also accepts that change is needed at an organisational level – 75% of respondents stated that they were focused on reducing the carbon footprint of their organisation as a whole.
